Why do we learn about Asia Pacific?

- Shifting power relativities between the major states
- The gradual rise of multi-polar security environment with the major Asian Power playing a larger role
- The rapid but uneven pace of economic growth, which is itself changing the geo-economic balance of power
- Significant increases in military capabilities and local defense industries
- The possibility and ethnic and national tensions, economic rivalry, disappointed aspirations for prosperity and religious or racial conflict

Change in the Asia Pacific region as well as globally do affect relations among the nations-states in the region. The direction of these changes is very uncertain today. Therefore, all the countries in the region which have a common interest in the maintenance of regional peace and stability should work together and find ways to assure that the changes do not pose a threat to region.

In addition there are also numerous sources of potential conflict in the Asia Pacific Region - unresolved territorial disputes, conflicting ideologies and claims for greater democratization being among them. These constraints will determine the dynamics of the security dimension in the Asia Pacific region in the next millennium.
